

Following all our tales of lockdown and limited excursions on our boats, here are some pictures and memories of an altogether different sort from Philip Tadd.

Bay of the Virgins, Fatu Hiva, Iles de Marquises, French Polynesia. "Serenity of Swanwick" at anchor our second anchorage after the 3000-mile crossing from the Galapagos.

The impressive peaks of Ua-Pou, Iles de Marquise's. Anchored off the town. A young girl when hearing that we were from England asked us if we knew the Queen, not such a strange question in a small island community where you would know everyone.

On the Island of Kioa in Fiji. The locals travel miles in these simple outrigger canoes to fish. The island was bought in 1946 by people from Tuvalu looking for a better place to live, they settled here and maintain their own customs, religion and lifestyle.

Children in the islands love to get involved, especially if they also get photographed. Children on Kioa launch our dinghy.
